Keynote Topic & Speaker:

UNDERSTANDING & MANAGING GENERATIONAL DIFFERENCES

Greg Anderson, North Texas Municipal Alliance (NTMA)

Today, more than ever, libraries employ and serve a wide range of generations. Recognizing generational language can help us understand the baffling and confusing generational differences that often drive our assumptions of and for one another. Understanding generational information is critical to blending generations in a way that will work for and not against our organization. Greg Anderson will review some generational identities and explain how to use that information in working with our colleagues, our customers and our supporters.

Greg Anderson, Associate Executive Director of NTMA, has 20 years of experience training, coaching, managing and working with non-profit and for profit agencies. He has a passion for helping people maximize their potential in all areas of life and has trained accordingly. He has authored two educational curriculums for teens, facilitated in-service training for private and public school systems, lectured at the collegiate level and trained government employees on a variety of topics at local and state levels.

Greg loves to laugh and bring smiles to the faces of workshop participants. At the same time, he realizes that many things in the workplace and in dealing with the public are not laughing matters. The result is a balanced approach to his presentations, which reflect a wealth of research and personal experience in such areas as Advanced Listening Skills, Conflict Management and Resolution of Corporate Pain, and Understanding and Managing Generational Differences in the Workplace.
